The middle ground is a vast green field. The background shows a horizon with a bright sunset and some distant structures. The sky is filled with dramatic, colorful clouds.

Is Google Spying on Me?

Have you ever browsed something online and afterwards ads for the site or item – or something like it – appear on other sites you visit online?

Google calls this targeting or retargeting advertisements, and it's how the company makes money. This activity begs the question, is Google spying on me, and if so, how can I stop it.

Google collects data on your activity when you use Google devices, apps and services, such as Gmail, Chrome, YouTube, and Google Maps. With ongoing privacy concerns, you should know the kind of information Google tracks about you, how it uses the information, and what you can do to better protect and safeguard your Google searches.

What Does Google Track & Why?

Google tracks the places you go both online and in person. It also tracks the purchases you make, what you search for, the videos you watch, the device you use, and more. Google would say its data collection policies help deliver more relevant search results and ads like such a bad thing – or does it?
